State of Idaho Office of Attorney General Lawrence Wasden

Dear Parents:

Not surprisingly, technology has become a large part of our lives. Whether it is on a computer or on a cell phone, most of us, as well as our children, use these tools every day. With the fast-paced development of new technologies, the knowledge gap between children and their parents is widening. What you don't know can hurt your kids.

With all of the time that children and young adults spend texting, e-mailing, instant messaging, blogging, gaming, and chatting, a new language, or "lingo," has developed. This "lingo" consists of acronyms and abbreviated text used as shortcuts in messages and can be very hard to decipher at times. This dictionary is designed to help you interpret and translate the messages your children are sending and receiving.

In addition to this dictionary, my office has developed several additional tools to help keep teens safe while they are online. ProtecTeens™ is a video presentation that teaches parents and teens about dangers from sexual predators on the Internet. The ProtecTeens resource kit contains a Family Contract for Internet Safety, an Internet Safety Manual, a Parents' Guide to Social Networking Websites, and a Parental Control Information guide that provides information on computer and software settings to better protect families online. You can view the ProtecTeens video and these materials, or request copies by mail, by visiting www.ag.idaho.gov. I hope you find these tools helpful.

A NEW LANGUAGE HAS EMERGED

For many parents, the idea of keeping up with technology can be quite worrisome. Means of communication continually change with the introduction of new technologies. It wasn't long ago that our kids thought e-mail was the greatest form of communicating with their friends and family. Now, texting, instant messaging, blogging, and Twittering have taken the place of e-mail, and are just a few of the ways your children might be communicating with others.

As these new technologies have developed, a new cyber language has emerged. This slang, or "lingo," is a combination of acronyms and abbreviations. It is shorter and easier to type than the complete words or sentences. However, it is not so easy to decipher. To many parents, it looks like a foreign language.

This lingo is used everyday in online chat rooms, instant messages, blogs, e-mails, online gaming rooms, and comments posted to social networks, such as FaceBook.com and MySpace.com. On a cell phone, this lingo is used for text messaging.

Acronyms are popular in our day-to-day world. For example, OK, TGIF, and RSVP are all acronyms that most people have seen. On the Internet or on a cell phone, however, there are literally thousands of acronyms and abbreviations that kids and adults are using.

Emoticons are another popular form of lingo. Also known as "smileys," emoticons are keyboard characters used in combination that symbolize facial expressions or moods. You have probably seen the emoticon :-) or :-(, but there are probably hundreds that you haven't seen.

These acronyms, abbreviations, and emoticons form a cryptic code that is often difficult to decipher, making it a challenge to read messages that children are sending. Without understanding this Internet lingo, parents cannot understand the interactions their children experience on the Internet.

If your child received the following message, would you be able to decipher it?

“19/m/ca watz ur n/a/s/l? snd m ur p# we can pRt! g2g4n”

To most people, this looks like nonsense, but it's not. The message is from a 19-year-old male located in California (19/m/ca), asking for the recipient's name, age, sex, and location (watz ur n/a/s/l). His message is: “Send me your phone number (snd m ur p#). We can party! (we can pRt!) Got to go for now (g2g4n).”

To help you understand how acronyms and abbreviated text are used, we have included the following snapshots of real Internet website profiles and chat rooms.

Below is a screen shot from the comment area on a popular social networking website:

EMOTICONS

An emoticon is a sequence of symbols, letters, and numbers that emulate a facial expression. These emoticons are used together with text acronyms in instant messages, comments, gaming sites, e-mails, texting, blogs, and chats. Some are read straight-on, but most are intended to be read sideways. For example, you can recognize the smiley face emoticon :-) with your head tilted to the left.
